ECTS: 3

This BIP targets BA and MA students of history, philosophy or related programs within humanities. It aims to discuss the issue of plurality in history, which is common when it comes both to events such as the fall of the Roman Empire or the French Revolution and to larger periods such as histories of Europe. In history, it happens quite often that various historians approach the same events or periods in a different way and, subsequently, they offer different or even competing accounts of them. Is plurality inevitable? Should it be welcomed? Should it be avoided? Could it result in relativistic approach to the past? During the BIP we will first address theoretical issues of objectivity, plurality, nature of history and, consequently, we will focus on concrete examples of plurality (case studies comparing various works about history of Europe, about the fall of the Roman Empire etc.)

Students will learn more about the problem of plurality. They will have a chance to find out more about related theoretical issues but also to discuss concrete examples. In conclusion, they will be asked to select their own examples of plurality and prepare in groups their own case studies.
